1) _____

Finland won with Lordi's memorable heavy metal entry in 2006 while, in stark contrast, Salvador Sobral's jazz waltz topped the competition for Portugal in 2017. Italy took top billing in 2021 with Måneskin's rock performance, 10 years after the Italian Raphael Gualazzi finished second with a jazz entry.

2) _____

Few elections have been more closely contested or more important than those taking place in Turkey on Sunday. Voters face a stark choice which will not only define their country's future, but reverberate more widely. Recep Tayyip Erdogan has been part of a broader global shift towards authoritarianism. His defeat could have moved Turkey back towards democracy and greater freedom.

3) _____

The designer made this in the early 70s for her label, Biba. It is one of the few pieces she still has from that era. I made this jacket for Twiggy in the early 70s, which is why it's so tiny. It was an early sample. I just said: "Do you want to wear it?" We were doing lots of clothes for her at the time – we were one of the few labels that did small sizes. Leopard prints have always inspired me.

4) _____

Tyson Fury's US promoter has revealed that negotiations over a potential meeting with Oleksandr Usyk have resumed, with the prospect of the world heavyweight title unification bout taking place in Saudi Arabia as part of a tournament also featuring Anthony Joshua.

Fury is likely to face Zhilei Zhang at Wembley in July following the Chinese fighter's victory over Joe Joyce last month.

5) _____

The Spanish government has approved a €2.2bn (£1.9bn) plan to help farmers and consumers cope with an enduring drought that has been exacerbated by the hottest and driest April on record. The measures were signed off by the cabinet on Thursday. They include €1.4bn of funds to tackle the drought and increase the availability of water, and €784m from the agriculture ministry to help farmers maintain production and avoid food shortages.

The Pink Police Station. If colour is energy, is blue right for the dining room?

Now, here's a theory: you and I are energy. We are colour. When we're feeling fed up and run-down, this may mean that we have too much or too little colour in us. Each of us is attracted to one colour more than others, and the reason for this is that colours have energy in them, and that is what draws us to them. Every colour affects our cell structures, sending very fine chemical vibrations onto our nervous system.

According to the Swiss psychologist Max Luscher, colour and personality are so closely linked that he developed a test to reveal character traits by the sequence in which a subject chooses colours. Top colour therapist Angela Wright agrees that colour elicits a strong psychological response, which is why the appearance of rooms in a house is so vital to its inhabitants' well-being. The biggest mistake interior designers make is not to take into account the personality of the client whose home they are decorating and the activity associated with a particular room, she says. For instance, if you painted your dining room blue, then, says Wright, you'd have very boring dinner parties because that colour is calming. One police force in southern Britain was so convinced by theories of colour that they painted their cells pink - a nurturing, romantic colour - to try and stop their temporary guests feeling aggressive.

According to fashion expert 'Annie', a columnist for Britain's Observer newspaper, certain colours suit people better than others, and so care should be taken when selecting clothes. There's nothing new about that of course. People with good dress sense have always worried about what to wear, and colours go in and out of fashion. But Annie goes further than this. She suggests that the best colours are those that complement or reflect the wearer's eye colour. If you have hazel eyes, for example, certain shades of green are just right.

So, there it is. Colour counts, and it's important for all of us. If the kitchen needs repainting, or if you're thinking of having the living room done; if you feel like having your hair dyed or you just want to go out and spend money on clothes, work out what colour suits your personality and your looks best: learn which ones will affect your nervous system and how they will do this. Take colour seriously and it will improve your life - and make you feel good about it too.
